In the middle of the thirteenth century, Matthew Paris drew a picture of an elephant, which was the first elephant ① that had been seen in England. The figure of the servant by its side is not a very convincing likeness, though we are given his name, Henricus de Flor. But what is interesting ② is that in this case the artist was very anxious to get the right proportions. Between the legs of the elephant there is a Latin inscription saying: 'By the size of the man ③ portrayed here you may imagine the size of the beast represented here.' To us this elephant may look a little odd, but it does show that medieval artists, at least in the thirteenth century, were very well aware of ④ such things as proportions, and that, if they ignored them so often, they ⑤ were so not out of ignorance but simply because they did not think they mattered.

The Louvre's CD-ROM offers a wonderful view of the Mona Lisa. One can almost see her very pores on the computer screen; the reproduction is brighter than the original, ① revealing more of the landscape in the background. The zoom tool permits viewers to ② carefully examine features as the commentator lists them. Yet people do still make a journey ③ see Leonardo's original painting in the Louvre. The feeling of awe is almost religious as international crowds file past the mysterious face ④ that rests, smiling, in her closed glass box. The atmosphere is one of quiet excitement and people record the momentous occasion with videos and snapshots. Mona Lisa's aura is by no means an illusion, ⑤ though there is something sadly ironic about visitors' trying to capture her with their own mechanical reproductions.
