

3 다음 글의 주제로 가장 적절한 것은?

A species that survives by eating another species is typically referred to as a predator. The word brings up images of some of the most dramatic animals on Earth: cheetahs, eagles, and killer whales. You might not picture wood warblers, a family of North American bird species characterized by their small size and colorful feathers, as predators; however, these beautiful birds are huge consumers of insects. The hundreds of millions of individual warblers collectively remove literally tons of insects from forest trees every summer. Most of these insects prey on plants. By reducing the number of insects in forests, warblers reduce the damage that insects inflict on forest plants. The results of a study that excluded birds from white oak seedlings showed that the trees were about fifteen percent smaller because of insect damage over two years, as compared to trees from which birds were not excluded.

* seedling 묘목

- ① new ways to protect endangered species
- ② smart ways to escape from forest predators
- ③ the role of wood warblers in forest preservation
- ④ the uniqueness of wood warblers' survival instinct
- ⑤ the rapid decrease in the number of predator species

4 다음 글의 주제로 가장 적절한 것은?

Corporations were once task-oriented groups, created in the nineteenth century through charters to perform specific projects like canal or railroad building. The word “corporate” still suggests a group engaged in some collective project—beyond making money for shareholders—and well into the postwar period corporations continued to define themselves in terms of their products and overall contribution to society. But with the rise of “finance capitalism” in the 1980s, shareholders' profits came to beat all other considerations, even pride in the product. Harvard Business School's Rakesh Khurana, who has recorded the decline of professional management, traces how the idea of the corporation evolved through policy statements made by the Business Roundtable. In 1990, the Business Roundtable representing America's large corporations stated that “corporations are chartered to serve both their shareholders and society as a whole,” including such stakeholders as employees, customers, suppliers, and communities.

* charter 인가서, 설립하다

- ① conflict management in corporations
- ② the social responsibility of corporations
- ③ strong competition among corporations
- ④ the changing conception of the corporation
- ⑤ shareholders' growing influence on corporations