To live with constant energy, it is important to get your emotional faults corrected. The late Knute Rockne, one of the greatest college football coaches ever, said that a football player cannot have sufficient energy unless his emotions are under spiritual control. In fact, he went so far as to say that he would not have a man on his team who did not have a genuinely friendly feeling for every fellow player. “I have to get the most energy out of a man,” he said, “and have discovered that it cannot be done if he hates another man. Hate blocks his energy and he isn’t up to par until he eliminates it and develops a friendly feeling.” People who lack energy are disorganized by their deep, fundamental emotional and psychological conflicts, such as guilt and fear. Sometimes the results of this disorganization are extreme, but healing is ever possible.

Not surprisingly, workers are more productive and effective when they receive guidance and support based on an accurate appraisal of their performance. In an ideal world, appraisal of workers’ performances would be based solely on how well they do their jobs. However, subjective biases often affect workers’ evaluations. For example, supervisors tend to focus on the worker rather than on the worker’s performance. Supervisors may form general impressions of liking or disliking workers and base their evaluations on these impressions rather than on the work performed. The tendency to rate workers according to general impressions can be reduced by instructing raters to focus on how well the worker carries out specific tasks. Learning theorists have suggested that the criteria for appraisal be totally objective—based on publicly observable behaviors and outlined to workers and supervisors before performance. Workers should be penalized for no such thing as “poor attitude.”
