In an experiment, researchers presented eight college students with thirteen sets of three anagrams. In eight of the thirteen trials, participants solved their anagrams working alone in separated private spaces. In the other five trials, they were instructed to stand up, walk to the front of the room, and try to solve the anagrams on a large blackboard in plain view of the other participants. In these public trials, performing well on the anagrams was more important, since the participants would reap some social rewards in the form of the admiration of their peers or be humiliated if they failed in front of everyone. Would they solve more anagrams in public, when their performance mattered more or in private, when there was no social motivation to do well? As you've probably guessed, the participants solved about twice as many anagrams in private as in public.

One study found that people who had just watched a video of television bloopers were better at solving a puzzle long used by psychologists to test creative thinking. In the test people are given a candle, matches, and a box of tacks and asked to attach the candle to a corkboard wall so it will burn without dripping wax on the floor. Most people given this problem fall into “functional fixedness,” thinking about using the objects in the most conventional ways. But those who had just watched the funny film, compared to others who had watched a film on math or who exercised, were more likely to see an alternative use for the box holding the tacks, and so come up with the creative solution: tack the box to the wall and use it as a candleholder.
