Anthony Burns was born a slave in Virginia, and early on disregarded law by learning to read and write. Converted to the Baptist faith while a young man, he began to preach. When his owner hired him out, he gained enough autonomy to plan his escape. In February 1854, at the age of nineteen, he hid himself on a ship bound from Richmond to Boston, where he found work. Ironically his ability to write led to his capture. A letter home was intercepted; it revealed where he was, and his master demanded that the Boston court return him to slavery in accord with the Fugitive Slave Law. Despite the desperate mobilization of the abolitionists to save him, government forces succeeded in shipping Burns back to Virginia in June 1854.

2 The Complete Herbal에 관한 다음 글의 내용과 일치하는 것은?

The Complete Herbal written by Nicholas Culpeper first appeared in 1652. Culpeper's aim was to supply the information that would allow ordinary people to identify medicinal plants they could find growing in fields and bushes near their homes and use them to make home remedies that would heal them. Sometimes he described precisely where a particular herb could be found. The book sold for three pence, which made it available to the poor. Also, Culpeper wrote in simple, straightforward English that ordinary people could understand. The Complete Herbal was an immediate success. For more than 250 years it was the principal guide to traditional cures that ordinary people used, and it is still in print. Nicholas Culpeper is regarded as one of the founding fathers of modern herbalism.
