Carl Rogers spent his early years in a wealthy Chicago suburb. His father viewed such activities as playing cards and going to the movies as questionable. When Rogers was twelve, his family moved to a farm farther from the city to protect the children from what his father perceived to be immoral influences. Rogers took refuge in books and developed an interest in science. His first college major was agriculture. During a student visit to China in 1922, he was exposed for the first time to people from different racial backgrounds. It was during this period that he wrote his parents proclaiming his independence from their conservative views. Shortly thereafter he developed an ulcer and had to be hospitalized. It is unclear whether Rogers's rebellion against his father and the development of the ulcer were causally linked, but the coincidence seems quite noteworthy.

10 split-level houses에 관한 다음 글의 내용과 일치하지 않는 것은?

You may never have visited a split-level home, but you have probably seen one on TV, especially if you have ever watched an American television show recorded during the 1960s or 1970s. These houses have internal stairs that allow the main entrance to reach both a sleeping level and an entertainment level. Because of a high demand for this kind of “isolated” living in the 1950s and later, many of these houses were built quickly and cheaply. The concept of a split level derives from legendary architect Frank Lloyd Wright's idea of houses with “half floors” that would blend more naturally with the surrounding landscape. The method behind split-level mania is that a house with a stacked floor plan does not require a level lot. Like “bank barns,” split-levels could be built into, against, or even on a hill.
