Henri Matisse came late to painting, having trained to be a lawyer to please his father. While he was in the hospital recovering from surgery, his mother brought him a box of paints and a how-to book, and the world lost an attorney and gained an artist. “It was as if I had been called,” he remembered. “Henceforth I did not lead my life. It led me.” Matisse left for Paris to study art, with his father shouting, “You’ll starve!” He gained fame as leader of the Fauves’ 1905 show. In 1917 Matisse began to spend winters in Vence, where he donated a chapel of his own design that is one of the most moving religious buildings in Europe. After local nuns nursed him through a serious illness in the 1940s, the grateful Matisse devoted himself to every detail of the chapel.

The northern part of Sumeria, known as Babylonia, gave rise to the earliest successful attempt to unite the Near East when Sargon crushed the power of Lugalzagesi of Umma, securing control over the region. His capital at Akkad dominated an empire that became ever more centralized. A calendar was introduced for the whole of Babylonia, new systems of taxation and standardized weights and measures were imposed, and Akkadian became the language of government. Sargon’s armies reached as far as the Mediterranean coast, but it was difficult to control the outlying regions. Rebellion broke out in the reign of Sargon’s grandson, Naram-sin, who took on the title “king of the world” and was worshipped as a god while alive. Naram-sin was victorious, but thereafter the Akkadians were on the defensive; their empire eventually fell during the reign of King Sharkalisharri, the son of Naram-sin.
