We met Tasmika one afternoon when we were visiting Tanya and her son, Victor. Tasmika was playing with Victor. ① She was a small child with quick dark eyes and long braids of hair that reached her waist. There was nothing shy about Tasmika. ② She was happy and cheerful. She smiled and tossed ③ her braids as she talked, and she seemed to fill the room with her liveliness. Tanya told us that Tasmika lived on the next street with her mother and father. ④ She added with a smile that Tasmika was also in first grade and that she was a good reader. That was all Tasmika needed to hear. She had come straight from school, and she had her book bag with ⑤ her. She opened it up, took out a book, and flipped through the pages.

Marlon Brando was the leading man in Charlie Chaplin's last movie, 1967's A Countess from Hong Kong. The two men never went together well, and Brando emerged from the experience with considerable bitterness for the filmmaker ① he had once called "probably the most talented man the medium has ever produced." Chaplin, ② he revealed in his autobiography, was a "fearsome cruel man," and "an egotistical tyrant and a penny-pincher." "③ He harassed people when they were late," Brando charged, "and scolded them unmercifully to work faster." One time when Brando showed up fifteen minutes late to the set, Chaplin chewed him out in front of the entire cast and crew, scolding ④ him as a disgrace to the acting profession. ⑤ He subsequently demanded and received an apology from Chaplin. For his part, Chaplin said that working with Brando was simply "impossible."
