The villagers pair off quickly, and the whole hall is soon in motion. Apparently nobody knows how to waltz, but that is nothing of any consequence — there is music, and they dance, each as he pleases, just as before they sang. Most of them prefer the “two-step,” especially the young, with whom it is the fashion. The older people have dances from home, strange and complicated steps which they execute with grave solemnity. Some do not dance anything at all, but simply hold each other’s hands and allow the undisciplined joy of motion to express itself with their feet. Among these are Jokubas Szedvilas and his wife, Lucija; they are too fat to dance, but they stand in the middle of the floor, holding each other fast in their arms, rocking slowly from side to side and grinning with delight.

Ara worked hard on the field that day, and her husband, Urgh, had departed several days before to go hunting with some adults in the clan. Her baby stirred and started to cry. She knew that this crying was not because the little one was hungry, but because of the loud roaring in the sky. She hoped that Urgh would be able to come back before a furious storm would break out. As things became darker and the winds were gaining strength, she heard the sounds of the returning hunting party and rushed out of the hut. Her husband was with the leading males, a small animal dangling around his shoulders. He greeted Ara by hugging her. When looking him in the eyes, she realized that the days of hunting had been successful.
