On the day we were to leave Warsaw, we formed a long line. The soldiers were dividing people up — women and children and old people one side, and able-bodied people the other side — separated by barbed wire. My mother and I were standing about next to the train that we were going to get into and my father was on the other side. My mother shouted at him, “Jurek!” (George, come over!) He ran and vaulted the fence and they shot at him but missed. My mother immediately made him sit under the train and she put some flour on his head to make him look as if he had grey hair. They came and looked in a cursory way. My mother and I stood still as if we didn’t know anything, waiting for them to go back.

When my daughter was three years old, I took her ice skating for the first time, even though I hadn’t been on the ice for almost twenty years. I laced up her tiny white skates, my fingers performing the act as if I did it every day, and then we hobbled to the rink. She reached up, grabbed my hand, and stood upright, and we glided into the cold. At that moment of sliding across the ice, holding someone’s hand was surprisingly emotional. After a few times around the rink, I let go of my little girl’s hand and off she went, by herself. With a big grin on my face I watched the small figure outstretching her arms and gliding away and thought she would soon be skating through life on her own.
