The silence came over everything again, as though sound itself had been ripped from the earth. I stood there, wondering what to do. Should I go down to the beach? K might be down there somewhere, buried in the sand But I decided not to leave the dike. I knew from experience that big waves often came in twos and threes. I'm not sure how much time went by — maybe ten or twenty seconds — when the next wave came. Another enormous roar shook the beach, and again, after the sound had faded, another huge wave raised its head to strike. It towered before me, blocking out the sky, like a deadly cliff.

I saw Miss Brown floating majestically upward at the front of the line. Why? How? What was happening? It took me a second to remember that there were a dozen or so steps up to the stage and she was walking up them. Steps! I had forgotten there were steps. I had seen them before, but they were not part of my mental practice; I hadn't practiced them in my mind's eye. My ankles went shaky, and I felt hot and cold all over. Lula glided upward in front of me without any apparent problem. I followed her and somehow made it to the top, and then stopped myself just in time from staring into the dazzling safety lights that marked the edge of the stage. We made it to our chairs, and the applause died down like a passing storm.
