One way of looking at trust in personal relations centers around your fears of rejection. Let us look at the progressive disclosure of personal information as part of the process of building trust. You show some trust in another by making a disclosure that is a little ① risky. If the other is ② supportive about your disclosure, trust is likely to be enhanced. Trust may be further enhanced if the other risks ③ disclosing at a similar level of intimacy. However, if the other person ④ accepts your initial disclosure, you are unlikely to risk deeper disclosures and may even end the relationship. Where both of you feel relatively ⑤ safe, you may be prepared to continue testing and building trust by disclosing at a slightly deeper level.

Today's TGV drivers, however, spend their working day comfortably seated in a warm or air-conditioned cab.

In the late 1940s, the train drivers in France had been doing dangerous manual work — operating steam engines — for upwards of four decades. (①) By retirement in their early fifties, they were exhausted: often sick and with a life expectancy rarely in excess of ten years. (②) Generous pensions were the least they could reasonably ask, and the burden on the state was easily tolerated. (③) The nearest they come to manual labor is when they press a series of electric switches to activate their machinery. (④) For them to retire before the age of fifty-five appears absurd. (⑤) Thanks to the medical and other provisions of the French welfare state, such men may reasonably expect to live well into their eighties, which places a significant burden upon the public finances.
