Each year the HR Advertising Company in North America presents their top performers with Dream Awards. As most companies do, HR uses objective performance criteria to determine who should receive these awards. What makes their approach so different, and so powerful, is that each winner receives a unique award. During the year, the company sends out a survey to every employee asking them to identify what prize they would like to receive if they should win. The prize value is capped at $10,000, and it cannot be changed into cash, but other than these two restrictions, each employee is free to pick whatever prize he wants. Then, at the end of the year, after the winners have been identified by their performance, HR cross-references each winner to the prize he identified, shoots a video explaining why he won and why he selected the particular prize, and, in the big Dream Awards ceremony, plays the video and awards the prize.

You can imagine the impact of these personalized prizes. It's a typical thing to be brought up on stage and given yet another plaque and trophy. However, it's a different thing entirely when, in addition to _____, you receive college tuition for your child or your new kitchen or a fancy motorcycle you've always dreamed of. The airline tickets to fly one winner and his family back to Mexico last year to visit the grandmother he hasn't seen in ten years are the prize everyone at the company still talks about.
