There is a wide consensus that global warming results in an intensification of water cycle, with more intense periods of rainfall and the lengthening of dry periods. Most climate models project _____ in many regions. Models also project a tendency for drying in mid-continental areas during summer, indicating a greater risk of droughts in these regions. In a warmer climate, the models project that rain tends to concentrate in more intense events, with longer periods of low rainfall in between. Therefore, intense and heavy episodic rainfall events with high runoff amounts are followed by longer relatively dry periods. It is also notable that, in relation to changes in mean rainfall, the wet extremes are projected to become more severe in many areas where mean rainfall increases, and the dry extremes are projected to become more severe in areas where mean rainfall decreases.

One of my graduate school advisers, Tom Wallsten, used to say that he wanted to become an expert on wines that cost $15 or less. Tom's idea was that if he started buying fancy $50-a-bottle wines, he would get used to that level of quality and would no longer be able to derive any pleasure from cheaper wines. Moreover, he reasoned that if he started consuming $50 bottles, over time he would have to escalate his spending to $80, $90, and $100 bottles, simply because his taste would have adapted to a higher level of finesse. Finally, he thought that if he never tried $50 bottles in the first place, his taste would be most sensitive to changes in wine quality of varieties in his preferred price range, further increasing his satisfaction. With those arguments in mind, he , became an expert in $15 wine, and lives very happily that way.
